Henry Yelkus (also spelled Yalkus, Yelkes, Yelkis, Yal-kus, and Yelcus), a member of the Molalla tribe, lived at Dickey Prairie, southeast of present-day Molalla, Oregon. His father, Chief Yelkus (Kil-ke), was one of three signatories of the May 6, 1851, land-cession treaty at Champoeg and the 1855 Treaty with the Kalapuya, etc. at Dayton. In 1856, the Northern Molalla tribes, including Henry Yelkus, his older adopted sister Molala Kate, and members of thirty-three other tribes, were forced to walk sixty miles on a branch of Oregon’s Trail of Tears to Fort Yamhill, on the present-day Grand Ronde Reservation.

After years of being subjected to poor and crowded conditions, and not having received the benefits verbally promised by then- Superintendent of Indian Affairs Joel Palmer in 1856, many people left the Grand Ronde Reservation in the early 1860s to return to their ancestral locations. Henry Yelkus and Molala Kate were among those who chose to leave, traveling with Molalla chief Siam Beavertrapper and his family back to Dickey Prairie.

By local accounts, the Molallas were welcomed back to Dickey Prairie by white resettlers, with whom they had established friendly relations. Such amicability had been fostered in 1848 when the local Molallas sided with the resettlers against Crooked Finger (Molalla) and his Klamath band during the Battle of Abiqua. But the way of life and land had changed in Dickey Prairie, and many Natives left again, unable to adjust to a landscape dominated by fences and plowed fields.

Like his sister Kate, Yelkus moved to Oregon City to find work, but after a few years he returned to Dickey Prairie, where he became an established figure in the community. According to one source, he was granted citizenship in 1869 (tribal people were not considered citizens until the American Indian Citizenship Act of 1924) and in 1893 gained the title to the homestead he lived on.

Yelkus lived a mile up the north fork of the Molalla River on the property of a white settler. He was the only tanner for the town of Molalla, and farmers and town residents went to him with hides of deer and other animals to turn into chamois. Wes Mitts, a Molalla resident who was a young boy at the time, later recalled that residents paid Yelkus in cash or other commodities such as dried deer or calf brains, a tanning agent. Yelkus's first wife, also a Molalla, made gloves and moccasins to sell.

In about 1880, Yelkus wanted to take Nellie Beavertrapper, the daughter of Chief Beavertrapper, as his second wife. He paid the chief a bride-price of three horses and brought her into the home. His first wife, reportedly unhappy with the decision, became withdrawn, dressed herself in fine clothes, and disappeared. She was found three days later, having hanged herself on the bank of Dickey Creek.

Henry and Nellie Yelkus had one son, possibly adopted, named Dush-Wil-Guslik (also known as Fred), but their marriage did not last. Nellie left Henry in 1891 and married Harry Clark. Henry Yelkus continued to live at Dickey Prairie, and Fred went to the Chemawa Indian School in Salem.

In 1913, the Oregon Pacific Railroad completed a section of rail line leading to the town of Molalla. The arrival of the first train on September 19 was cause for celebration. Yelkus was invited to be the guest of honor. Adorned in his father’s regalia, he led the procession through town on his horse. “I was born here 67 years ago,” he told reporters. “I am the last of the Molalla Indians. They named this place from our tribe. When I was a boy there were many of my people here. Now they are all gone [moved to reservations]. My hat of deerskin and flicker feathers belonged to my grandfather. But he and the old times are gone.”

A few days later, Henry Yelkus was found dead along the road between Mount Angel and Molalla. It was reported that Harry Clark told authorities that he had taken sick and died, but the Oregon City sheriff took Clark into custody on suspicion of murder. He was acquitted by a jury a few months later.

Henry Yelkus was laid to rest next to his first wife and his father at Dickey Prairie. Oregon newspapers widely reported the events of his death, falsely memorializing him as the “last of the
The Molalla Pioneer marked the passing of “Chief Henry” as “the passing of a nation.” But Henry Yelkus was not the last of the Molalla people. The Molallas and their culture continue to live on through descendants as members of the Confederated Tribes of Grand Ronde and other tribes.

Sources

Mitts, Wes. “Chief Yelkus, the one and only tanner in Molalla.” Molalla Area Historical Society. Web.

Toll, Dale R. "Last of the Molallas." Published Manuscript.

The Oregon Encyclopedia

https://oregonencyclopedia.org/articles/chief_henry_yelkus/